Dare to dream: 5 Indian entrepreneurs who are driving social change

f Hygiene for health

"Hygiene is still considered a luxury in India." It was this idea—as appalling as it's true—that drove Mohd. Shahid Hussain, a Delhi-based entrepreneur, to establish Aqsa Marketing. The company deals in inexpensive and high-quality hygiene products, with a mission to ensure that every person can afford basic hygiene, irrespective of their economic backgrounds. That's quite a calling considering that less than half of India's total population wash their hands with soap—a fundamental way to check the spread of infectious diseases and improve health standards. Aqsa products are presently available in eight Indian cities, with plans of expansion to 25 more.

In 2012, the census revealed that there were more households with a mobile phone than with a toilet. While the data translated into eye-grabbing headlines, it also revealed how basic hygiene was a luxury for the country's lower socio-economic strata.

The fact is, if access to even basic hygiene is made easier and affordable, it has multi-fold benefits on health and productivity of the country's populace. In fact,

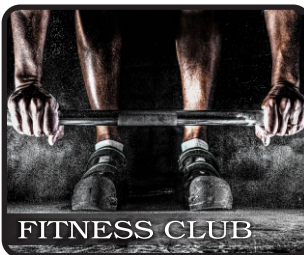

UNICEF says that hand-washing with soap can reduce diarrhoeal diseases by over 40 per cent and respiratory infections by 30 per cent. Diarrhoea and respiratory infections are among the key factors contributing to deaths of children in India.

Founder Mohammed Shahid Hussain aims to address this key developmental challenge and has already started operations in eight cities. Primarily targeting consumers from middle class, low income families who avoid buying hygiene products as they tend to be expensive, Shahid addresses their needs. His startup, Aqsa Marketing, procures raw materials from the source without compromising on quality and manufacturing standards. The final products are then distributed by employing rural personnel who directly reach out to the consumers. This lowers the distribution cost significantly. The startup also goes a step further to reach out to their target consumers at places like highway dhabas, and small commercial places, and help them understand the importance of investing in hygiene. Shahid says that in the long run, this will enable his target consumers to lead a healthy lifestyle and thereby spend less on health-related issues.
